Emotional Harm of Children in Separation and Divorce

Emotional harm to children chronically exposed to conflict has emerged as an important concern in separating and divorcing families. In high conflict custody cases the complexities of emotional harm are not well understood by child welfare professionals, clinicians, lawyers and judges. The absence of a common understanding within and between the clinical and legal communities has often left professionals at odds when working with these families. As a result, these cases are extraordinarily challenging to professionals involved with children, their parents and the family justice system.

Concurrently the growing body of research on the long-term impacts of adverse childhood experience hastens us to act decisively to ensure the best possible outcomes for children. How do we know when a child is experiencing emotional harm? When does the inevitable distress of parental separation turn into harm?

This unique day-long conference will challenge the professional community to evaluate current practices in case management and intervention in the context of these challenging custody cases. The day will open with Dr. Jean Clinton, renowned child and adolescent psychiatrist at Chedoke-McMaster Hospital. Dr. Clinton will address the complexity of alleged and actual emotional harm, and help to define a clear clinical understanding of this concept. Moderating an actual case conference attended by a social worker, clinical supervisor, and child welfare lawyer, Dr. Clinton will deconstruct the case from the perspective of emotional harm, provide clinical commentary, and address questions from the audience.

The afternoon will open with a presentation by Nicholas Bala. Professor Bala will examine the issue of emotional harm by providing a review of the case law. A mock trial will be then be presented including cross-examinations of a CAS social worker. Professor Bala will provide commentary on the legal aspects of the case. In her role as moderator, Dr. Clinton will comment upon the clinical issues as addressed during the trial, and facilitate the participation of the audience. The matter of 'evidence' will be considered with the goal of bridging the legal and mental health domains. Later, Dr. Clinton will offer commentary on the decisions of the judges, and Howard Hurwitz will provide commentary on the child welfare components of this case.

Conference Objectives:

- To summarize leading research on emotional harm and its impact on children
- To provide professionals with a common framework for understanding the concept of emotional harm from both a clinical and legal perspective
- To enhance clinical skills in assessing emotional harm in children
- To provide a framework to develop recommendations and assist in clinical and legal decision-making in cases involving emotional harm to children

Dr. Clinton's skills as a knowledge translator are frequently called upon, presenting to community groups nationally and internationally. She has authored papers on early child development and poverty, infant neglect, children's mental health, resilience, and on adolescent brain development. Dr. Clinton advocates for a system for children's well-being and promotes Asset Building believing All Kids Are Our Kids.

Nicholas Bala LL.M, JD

is a leading Canadian expert on issues related to children, youth and families in the justice system, and a Law Professor at Queen's University in Kingston, Canada. Much of his research work is interdisciplinary, collaborating psychologists, social workers, criminologists and health professionals to better understand how the law and the justice system should address such issues as parental rights and responsibilities after divorce, including parental alienation; spousal abuse and its effects on children; young offenders; child witnesses and child abuse. Nick has published extensively in journals in law, medicine, psychology and social work. His work is often quoted by all levels of court in Canada, including the Supreme Court of Canada, and has also been cited by courts in the United States, Australia and Britain.
